INTRODUCTION

Direct sales of farm products through farmers' markets continue to be a major outlet for producers. Although an upward trend started nearly two decades ago, this method of direct marketing experienced phenomenal growth nationally in the last 2 years. The 1996 National Farmers' Market Directory documents 2,410 farmers' markets operating in the United States during the 1995 calendar year, an increase of 655 markets over that reported in the 1994 Directory (1993 data). The growth and heightened visibility evident in the last 2 years corroborate the increasing importance and appeal of this method of marketing to a growing number of small- to medium-sized producers.

As farmers' markets increase in popularity, they become a more integral part of the urban/farm linkage. Both farmers and consumers benefit. Farmers have access to the market and consumers have access to locally grown, farm-fresh produce. Significant data exist that documents the strategic marketing advantages that local producers gain by selling through these facilities, including improved profit margins. Conveniently located, farmers' markets can provide an easily accessible and dependable source of food products to low-income consumers in communities where fresh nutritious foods are scarce. These market sites also create an environment for promoting nutrition education and good eating habits, along with providing tips on preparation of some gourmet dishes. This centralized market activity benefits each of the participants. As local farmers reap higher profits, consumers can access fresh, quality products, and the community improves its economic base.

Farmers' markets, as presented in this directory, are defined as a group of farmers and vendors leasing or renting space in a common facility/site on a temporary basis with an emphasis on the sale of fresh farm products, crafts, and other locally produced items. This directory is intended to provide an informative resource for farmers, operators, consumers, and the general public. The directory lists markets by name, location, contact person, telephone number, and type of operation (open-air/seasonal or year-round). Year-round generally (but not always) denotes that some type of covered facilities exist at the market site. The address of a market presented in this publication usually depicts market location and does not necessarily represent a complete mailing address. Therefore, any attempts to contact markets listed in this directory should be made by telephone, if possible.

The 1996 directory identified several farmers' markets operating on Indian reservations within Indian Nations. An asterisk appears at the market name to denote that the market is located within an Indian Nation.

The directory will be updated on a regular basis. Suggestions, comments, or market data corrections for future directories may be submitted to the following address:
